THE DOCUMENTS EXPEDITING PROJECT:

CURE FOR YOUR PROBLEMS IN ACQUIRING
NON-DEPOSITORY U. S. GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS

Documents Expediting Project
Exchange and Gift Division
Library of Congress
Washington, D. C. 20540

Since 1946 the Documents Expediting Project has provided a centralized service to its subscribers for acquiring non-depository U. S. Government publications which are not available by purchase either at the Government Printing Office or at the issuing agency.

Membership in the Documents Expediting Project is the best prescription available to libraries that have difficulty in acquiring non-depository publications. It is also geared to handle specific problems common to documents departments.

DocEx brings relief from eyestrain caused by searching through lists of publications, scanning bibliographies, pursuing those elusive "apply to issuing agency" publications. The Doc Ex staff carefully checks every available publications list issued by the various Federal agencies for non-depository items, together with accessions lists of libraries specializing in public affairs and advance proof sheets of the Monthly Catalog of United States Government Publications. Suitable titles are immediately requested by the Project for distribution to its members. DocEx performs these tasks regularly for its present members. Why not join these libraries taking advantage of large scale group acquisitions?

Demand frequently exceeds supply in the field of non-GPO Government publications, and an individual library, delayed by its regular process of searching, identifying, and ordering, frequently receives, in response to its orders, the reply: "supply exhausted." Not DocEx! Through advance bibliographic information, regular visits to issuing agencies, and many standing agreements with distribution offices for automatic delivery to DocEx at the time of publication, the Project is able to obtain needed items while supplies are relatively plentiful, and it is frequently able to distribute such items to its members even before publication is generally announced.

Even though slips and form letters are used, the typing of individual requests for current materials, each needing a special address, is an expensive method of acquiring non-depository materials for a documents collection. In these days of high salaries the Project's automatic delivery service for non-depository materials permits you to release your order personnel to perform other acquisitions tasks.

Are you faced with a stack of requests for non-depository current documents and claims for missing periodical issues? Do you have to address them to a score of different agencies with most of the slips due to come back marked "Out of Print?" Let DocEx, with its special know-how for finding the elusive "last copy" of a scarce item, go to work on those orders. Special requests for non-current Federal publications of all kinds, as well as specially needed current items, may be sent to the Project. The staff is able to fill over 80% of such requests received. A library using only the special request service would be able to receive publications worth much more than the subscription price to the Project, and still receive the regular distribution of the Project. All special requests are handled equally with no preference given to libraries paying a higher subscription rate.

Relieve your problems with a subscription to the Documents Expediting Project. By allowing DocEx to seek out and supply automatically the new publications, and by taking advantage of the centralized mailing list and special request facilities offered by the Project, a subscribing library receives materials and services which more than repay the cost of membership.

The Project's operating funds are provided entirely by subscriptions, which range from $150 to $500 per year, plus a flat fee of $25 per year for postage. Each participating library determines the amount of its subscription. That amount and precedence in the Project determine the subscriber's priority in the distribution of materials that are in short supply. Due to the difficulty in obtaining an unlimited number of copies, it is necessary to limit the Project to 150 members. At the present time there are a few vacancies in the Project, and if you feel the Project could solve some of your acquisitions problems, we advise you to subscribe to the Documents Expediting Project as soon as possible.
